Biodata

Gregg's journey in education began back in 1996 as an elementary school teacher in New York and has since built an extensive career in teaching, training, and academic consultancy. With nearly three decades of experience, he continues to inspire and support both teachers and students worldwide. His educational philosophy is grounded in the principle of filotimo: a Greek word that captures the spirit of "doing good" with kindness, integrity, and heart. This philosophy drives his belief that education should not only build skills but also shape lives. Gregg is an energetic international speaker who loves connecting with audiences on themes such as Personal and Professional Development, Global Skills, Student Motivation, and, most importantly, Having Fun while learning.

Harnessing the Keystone Mindset: Shaping Futures Through Mutuality

Abstract

What if the most powerful tool in English teaching isn't methodology, technology, or even language itself, but mindset? A keystone mindset of mutuality. I invite you to rethink teaching not as exporting expertise, but as expanding connection. Mutuality is the deliberate practice of interdependence: where teachers and students co-construct meaning, speaking to each other rather than at each other, and classrooms becoming rehearsal spaces for a more connected world. Expect stories, sharp reframes, and immediately applicable ideas: from bridge-building protocols to mutual feedback loops you can use the very next day. Because bridges are not built from just one side. And English, at its best, is not just a subject. It is shared space. So, let's strengthen the keystone, together!
