Think Connected, Create Change

Abstract

In a world shaped by complexity and constant change, learners need more than language proficiency; they need thinking skills that help them understand connections and respond responsibly to global challenges. This presentation explores different thinking skills as essential competencies for transformative action and highlights how language education can foster these capacities. Through the lens of Anglia Examinations, the session reflects on how assessment can move beyond measuring language accuracy to valuing communication, critical thinking, problem-solving, and the broader competencies learners need to become active contributors in shaping a better future.
